His need for self-representation in public space, the designation of spots with a personal statement and the enrichment of the surroundings with his own ideas and associations are expressed in the art of Thomas Mock in a diversity of graffiti and paintings on walls, wood or canvas. The artist known as “Keramik” in Vienna since the early 1990s has chosen his name because of his desire as a mortal and short-lived individual to leave lasting characteristic forms. After all, sometimes a couple of ceramic shards are among the few things that have remained from a past culture.
